Melbourne, an Overview 1984 volume 3 brings together all official documents which could be located on important aspects of the founding of Melbourne during the years 1836 to 1839 new information is here made available on the original planning of Melbourne control of many community activities and results of the earliest land sales decisions on Melbourne's first modest public buildings and roads are examined as well as the part played by soldiers convicts and government officials in bringing these works to completion other sections describe the first counting of population and stock the primitive public health services which attempted to provide medical assistance for whites and blacks and the beginnings of the main religious denominations and their attempts to provide church and Sunday school facilities as well as the first elementary education lists kept by the clergy of marriages births and deaths are published fully for the first time giving positive identification of the settlement's true pioneers

Melbourne's Development & Planning 1981 wharves to the world the development of Melbourne's world trade centre is a photographic chronicle of the history of the world trade centre and its surrounds the book traces the journey of land and the buildings that have occupied it from its beginnings with the Wurundjeri to its role as a trading hub in early Melbourne then as the site of the modern day world trade centre and now as part of a flourishing residential and commercial precinct

Melbourne 1994 the main theme of this research is centring people and their specific capabilities in the process of change within urban redevelopment in this regard in addition to considering affected people as the key actors in the process this research argues for the inclusion of both the reflexive and adaptive capabilities of human agents in particular this research focuses on the socio reflexive process underlying the change in beliefs in actions at both individual and social levels that could lead to place based identity and community building this people centred approach to redevelopment and its alternatives have been studied in the case of Melbourne docklands redevelopment the findings show that while the development approach applied in docklands has changed during its second decade of development commenced in 2010 towards a more collaborative perspective it still differs from a people centred approach and is far from reaching a community building goal this research finishes with recommendations for a new role for planners and governments aligned with this approach and future directions for research in urban development
