other facts to take into account or discoveries to be made which would modify tradition but a man who asks himself what is the point of contact between history and the life of his time what is the place of history in the human mind is bringing a different impulse to bear an impulse not of scholarship but of life and experience of course the historian in all ages has in some sense asked himself what is the purpose of history but no searching change had passed over the schools when macaulay s answer to the question could be that history imposes general truths on the mind by a vivid representation of characters and incidents an answer echoed even in our own day by lord rosebery s view of history as the treasure house of human biography and therefore of noble models and splendid inspiration such answers could not possibly be given by any one contemplating the style and aims of history at the present moment the conclusion he would be more likely to draw would be that the value of historical knowledge lay in its effect upon our response to the problems of our own time upon our mental vision in general and our intellectual reaction to every stimulus of information and criticism in other words history is for the first time genuinely looking backwards formerly the historian planted himself imaginatively at some point in the past and worked forwards it was not by an accident that certain people were moved to print the date b c at the opening of the bible or 764 b c at the beginning of a roman history it was essential to their point of view that they should have a definite place at which to set out upon their travels the modern historian finds that definite place in his own day he does not transport himself to a past period and work towards his day looking backwards he singles out the significant features of the past and it is of less consequence to him than it was to his predecessors to date events their vitality is not in themselves but in the spark of fire with which they respond to the search lights this change in outlook was later than the change in method of leopards of normandy and its progress is less easy to trace because it has not been continuous a change historically affective
